A River of Memory

Throughout the collection, rivers serve as a recurring motif, symbolizing the flow of time and the interconnectedness of all things. In the poem "River Flow," Whyte writes:

Here, the river becomes a metaphor for the journey of life, a journey that is both inward and outward, leading us not only to the ocean of the collective unconscious but also to the depths of our own being.

Rivers also represent the passage of time, carrying with them the memories of our past and the hopes of our future. In the poem "The River's Song," Whyte writes:

By listening to the river's song, we can connect with the past and the future, and gain a sense of our place in the grand scheme of things.

Belonging is a feeling of being connected to something larger than ourselves, a feeling of being rooted in a place and a community.

Throughout River Flow New Selected Poems, David Whyte explores the search for meaning in life. In the poem "The Question," he writes:

The question is not what is the meaning of life but what is the meaning
```

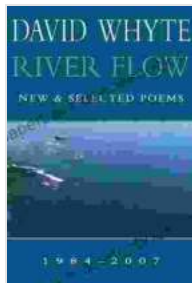

There is no one answer to this question, but Whyte suggests that we can find meaning in our lives by living in the present moment, by being present to the people and things around us.

In the poem "The Way," he writes:

The way is not a path that is laid out for us but a river that flows th

The way is not something that we can find by searching, but something that we can discover by living our lives fully and authentically.
